Scenes at a Chinese Execution.

The Shanghai correspondent of the Boston Traceller, under date of May 31st. gives the following account of the execution of 150 Chinamen at that place, with the butchery particulars more minutely told than has been done by any prean army surgeon, or a post mortem practitioner of the most extended practice:

The execution had been fixed at noon. At half-past eleven half a dozen men arrived at the execution ground, each armed of the rank to which he belonged, he a sword, and preceded by bearers of rough pine boxes, decorated with sides painted as if with blood. These were coffins for the case of the passage by him actness when the cleaver would fall upon his own neck. General uncencern, and even a stocial indifference, marked the countenances of both soldiers and spectators, who together amounted to about one hundred and fifty. A breeze sprang up, which carried the intolerable stench from the quarter occupied by the Chinese are a mystery; I cannot underforeigners, who to the number of a dozen, had obtained admittance to the top of one of the houses on the side of the street at the entrance of this "field of blood." Soon after the arrival of the executioners and the coffins, a division of the condemned appeared on the ground, consisting of ten individuals, speedily followed by the rest of the unhappy wrotches in companies of the same num-

Each prisoner had his hands tied be kind his back, and a label stuch in his tail or long queue, while he was thrust down into a wicker basket, over which his chained legs danced loosely, the body riding uncomfortably, and marked by a long paper tally pasted on a strip of bamboo thrust between the jacket of each condemned individual and his back. These "man baskets," as they are called, slung with small cords, were carried by bamboo poles upon the soulders" of two porters. As the prisoners arrived they were taken from the basket and made to kneel facing the south. In a space of twenty feet by twelve were counted as many as seventy prisoners, ranged in half-a-dozen rows. At five minutes to twelve, a Mandarin wearing a white button arrived, and the two individuals who were first to be cut in pieces were fied to the crosses which had been planted. This was probably designed to increase the terror of death o those who were about to experience it. just as though the natural bitterness was not sufficient. In the meanwhile that this frightening process was going on, the execution commenced, and 20 or 30 were headless before our friend was aware of it. The only sound to be heard was a horrid cheep, cheep, cheep, as the executioner's knife or cleaver fell upon the were seen in the faces of the prisoners, as they knelt and awaited the fatal moment. No entreaties were made; no shricks were heard. One blow was sufficient for each, the head tumbled be tween the leas of the victim before the body fell. As the sword fell, the trunk, sponting with blood, sprang forward, falling on the breast and was still forever.

In four minutes the execution was completed, and 150 human beings of all ages had passed into eternity. Thereupon, the other sections commenced a work still more barbarious and horrifyfor what could be more so?

The knife was then thrust into the abdomen, which was ripped up to the presst bone, and then twirled round and round, as the heart was separated from its holdings. Up to this moment, our informant said that having once set his eyes upon the victim under torture, they became fixed, as if by a strange spell, but now, neither he could stand it nor they be riveted any longer. A whirling sensation ran through his brain, and it was with difficulty he could keep from falling. But this was not all; the lashings were then cut, and his head being tied by the tail to a limb of the cross, was severed from the body, which was then dismembered of hands and arms, feet and legs, separately,

After this the Mandarian left the ground, to return, however, with a man and woman, the latter, as it was said, the wife of a rebel chief, and the man a leader of some rank among the rebels. The woman was cut up in the way already releft her in charge of two younger children, but for the man a more horrible dren, while she went to a neighbous, not see the operation; his overpowered on a lounge, with her clothes entirely sensibilities did not permit it; but an American sergeant of marines did, who She was insensible to pain then, but still at which a piercing scream was set forth the stove; that she ran out to the bars by the sufferer, and then the flesh was for help, and finding none, returned to the "l'emple of Horrors," because in severe blow upon the afflicted parents. mile," representations of the tortures of the Buddhist hell. The Sandwich Islanders are illustrative of the extent of this decrease of native population. Cook estimates the numbers on these Islands in 1778 at 400,-000—an estimate considered, however, taken in 1836 showed the population to be 108,579. More special statistics confirms the general fact of decrease: thus, the deaths in 1857 were 2007, and the births only 1615; and in prior years the disproportion has been even greater. The opulation of Tahiti was stated in 1778 at 121,000-the lowest estimate; at present it is less than 7000. It is most resent it is less than 7000.
